arli hotel business and wellness: The Effect of Grit on Customer Engagement of Wellness Services in the Hospitality Industry Zafar Waziha Sarkar, 2021 The global wellness market is the fastest growing market and is comprised of $4.5 trillion in 2021. The wellness industry consists of but is not limited to wellness tourism, physical activity, fitness, workplace wellness, spa industry, healthy eating, nutrition, and weight loss. As wellness awareness is getting attention, the hotels that provide wellness services have attracted attention within the hospitality industry. The hotel industry is looking to grow its business and the hotel professionals need to adopt wellness services to be more profitable. The wellness need of the hotel customers is an important factor for the hotels to be successful. To maintain sustained effort of wellbeing throughout the daily lifestyle, individuals are motivated to use wellness services. Consequently, it is important to identify the individual's motivation to use wellness services. While several previous studies found that perseverance and passion for long-term goals to stay physically fit is the antecedent for maintaining wellness, it was also found that perseverance and passion can predict wellness behavior. Grit is the psychological factor that is defined as perseverance and passion for completing long-term goals. This study proposes that grit is one of the psychological traits of the individuals that plays part in engaging in wellness activities during a hotel stay. Grit is the perseverance people show in achieving certain goals such as engaging in physical activity and sustaining it. 4 This study explores how grit in customers drives them to seek wellness activities during travel. Studying grit may help predict future wellness behavioral outcomes of the customers in the hospitality industry. While grit is a new construct, it has been proven to be a distinguishing factor in the transtheoretical model (TTM) stages of physical activity behavior. The purpose of this study was to assess different wellness services and amenities in the hospitality industry and examine how grit with respect to the TTM stages can lead to customers' using of wellness services and how hotels providing these wellness services can lead to customer engagement for the hotel industry. The nature of this study is three-fold: first, to develop attributes of wellness services in hospitality context as the hotel industry transitions to "new-normal" after the Coronavirus Pandemic outbreak; second, to explore the effects of different psychological traits on wellness services; third, to estimate the effects of wellness services on customer engagement. The current research explores the concept of grit as an important customer psychological trait when consuming wellness amenities during a hotel stay. An online survey was utilized for this study. The grit was measured by employing Duckworth and Quinn's (2009) short grit scale. Participants' involvement in the various stages of TTM was measured by Prochaska and Velicer's (1997) study. The wellness service attributes ("Hospital"ity attributes, physical fitness, and new normal necessities) were adopted from Chi et al. (2019), Compton (2020), Calvey (2020), Hilton (2019), Mueller and Kaufmann (2001), and Suess and Mody (2017). Customer engagement behavior items (i.e., visit intention, electronic word of mouth, and willingness to pay a premium) were 5 adopted from Chi et al., (2019), Choi and Kandampully (2019), and Risitano et al., (2017). An IRB approval was received for this study. The survey was sent to 491 prescreened respondents and 347 people took the survey, with a 71% response rate. Out of 347 recorded responses through the Qualtrics survey platform, a total of 337 completed responses were used to analyze the data.
