Understanding Lead Generation

Lead generation is the process of attracting and converting strangers and prospects into someone who has indicated interest in your company's product or service. It involves various marketing strategies and techniques aimed at capturing potential customers' attention and information. Understanding lead generation is essential for small businesses because it lays the foundation for building a customer base and achieving long-term growth.

There are two main types of leads: marketing qualified leads (MQLs) and sales qualified leads (SQLs). MQLs are leads that have shown interest in your product or service but are not yet ready to make a purchase. SQLs, on the other hand, are leads that have been vetted and are considered more likely to convert into paying customers. Knowing the difference between these two types of leads helps businesses strategize their marketing efforts effectively.
